

Federal Funding Is Essential To Saving the District of Columbia's Public Services

By Ryan Zamarripa July 10, 2020

This fact sheet is a joint publication between the Center for American Progress; the American Federation of Teachers; the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees; the Economic Policy Institute; the National Education Association; and the Service Employees International Union.

For a full list of sources, please see "Federal Funding Is Essential To Saving State and Local Public Services: State-by-State Fact Sheets," available at <https://www.americanprogress.org/?p=487191>.

The COVID-19 pandemic and resulting recession are wreaking havoc on the District of Columbia; the District is facing a massive revenue shortfall, which will significantly affect its budget and ability to provide crucial services. Federal funding is needed to help the District of Columbia, along with the local governments within the District, ensure that health care, education, transportation, first responders, and other services continue uninterrupted. The picture is already bleak: Since the pandemic started, the District has lost 100 public sector jobs. The economic gravity of the shortfall cannot be stressed enough. Without further federal aid to state and local governments, the District of Columbia is projected to lose 20,500 private and public jobs by the end of 2021. The recent resurgence of the virus only compounds the urgency and should dispel all complacency.

The coronavirus pandemic has decimated the District of Columbia's economy.

- In May, the District of Columbia had an unemployment rate of 8.9 percent, one of the highest rates ever recorded, with roughly 10,000 more District residents out of work than in February.
- As of early July, approximately 110,000 Washingtonians, representing 27.7 percent of the District's February labor force, have filed unemployment insurance claims since the beginning of March. Some estimates are projecting a double-digit unemployment rate well into 2021.

The District of Columbia's tax revenues are plummeting, creating a severe funding crisis for schools, health care, and other critical services. The District of Columbia government has projected a budget shortfall of $722 million in FY 2020, $774 million in FY 2021, and $606 million in FY 2022, representing declines of 9 percent, 9 percent, and 7 percent, respectively.

The National League of Cities estimates that cities will experience \$360 billion in revenue loss through FY 2022, which will force them to significantly cut spending on crucial services or raise taxes on already recession-battered residents. Studies on the Great Recession have found that forcing states to deal with severe budget constraints through austerity dampen long-term gross domestic product (GDP), prolong spells of high unemployment, and extend recessions.

Between February and May, 100 public sector workers were laid off in the District of Columbia.

These job losses could get much worse. A recent analysis conducted by the Economic Policy Institute estimates that without federal action, the District of Columbia will lose a combined total of 20,500 public and private jobs by the end of 2021.

Health care in the District of Columbia is also in jeopardy. The Urban Institute has projected that Medicaid caseloads could increase by as much as 41,000, or 19.2 percent, through FY 2021—a massive and unprecedented spike. The District of Columbia desperately needs help to cover those who are newly unemployed and expected to enroll in Medicaid and to offset extra Medicaid costs related to COVID-19. Without proper funding, the District will be unable to treat at-risk patients, keep families healthy, or provide lifesaving care. Funding Medicaid is critical to ensuring that the District of Columbia can respond effectively to the coronavirus public health crisis and the current economic recession.

The Health and Economic Recovery Omnibus Emergency Solutions (HEROES) Act, which passed the U.S. House of Representatives on May 15 with bipartisan support, includes provisions that would help the District of Columbia avoid additional layoffs and devastating cuts to services.

Specifically, it would:

- Allocate \$3.2 billion to the government of the District of Columbia and \$1.5 billion to its localities over a span of two years, saving thousands of jobs and helping to maintain the uninterrupted delivery of public services such as health care, first responders, and safe drinking water.
- Increase the District of Columbia's Federal Medical Assistance Percentage (FMAP) and provide an additional \$550 million in Medicaid dollars to the District of Columbia over an 18-month period.
- Provide \$1.6 billion for education in the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico, including \$1 billion for public K-12 schools and \$480 million to public colleges and universities, which would save an estimated 14,000 jobs supporting K-12 education and 7,400 supporting higher education. This funding would help strengthen distance learning and teaching strategies to keep students and teachers healthy.

Conclusion

As the recession stretches into the second half of 2020, it is becoming increasingly clear that states and localities are at the forefront of combating the pandemic and its economic fallout. From keeping students enrolled in remote learning programs to equipping community health centers with the protective gear needed to safely treat COVID-19 patients, state and local involvement can be seen and felt everywhere.

It is likely that both the coronavirus pandemic and the recession it led to are far from over. To help ease the financial pressures that states and localities are currently facing, it is imperative that the federal government pass legislation to:

1. Allocate at least $915 billion in direct grants to states, localities, tribes, and territories.
2. Increase the Medicaid FMAP by at least 14 percentage points until June 30, 2021.
3. Provide at least $90 billion to the State Fiscal Stabilization Fund to support both public schools and public colleges and universities.

Congress must act to get states and localities the aid they desperately need. The District of Columbia and its residents can't afford to wait.

Ryan Zamarripa is the associate director of Economic Policy at the Center for American Progress.