

Jonathan Asher serves as the director of the Governor's Office of Climate Preparedness and Disaster Recovery, within the Colorado governor's office. He returned to Colorado in 2020 to serve as Governor Polis's senior policy advisor after fifteen years in Washington D.C. where he spent roughly half of that time on Capitol Hill in senior energy, environment and natural resources policy roles. He also served as an appointee in the Obama administration at the Environmental Protection Agency, and as Director of Government Relations at The Wilderness Society where he was closely involved in the negotiation and passage of the Dingell conservation bill, and Great American Outdoors Act as the national co-chair of the Land and Water Conservation Fund Coalition.

Jonathan is a former whitewater river guide, former ski instructor and remains an avid climber, kayaker, skier and generally spending as much time outdoors as possible with his wife, Allison.
